Books

When God Lost Her Tongue: Historical Consciousness and the Black Feminist Imagination. New York and London: Routledge, 2021.

When God Lost Her Tongue recenters Black women’s histories by juxtaposing works of the Black feminist imagination with historical narratives. Drawing on an intersectional and diasporic approach, this book examines such diverse subjects as African goddesses during the Haitian Revolution and in contemporary popular culture, Black women in European art, the myths and truths of the “door of no return” on Gorée Island, and the icon of Harriet Tubman.

Venus in the Dark: Blackness and Beauty in Popular Culture. New York and London: Routledge, 2005, 2nd ed. 2018, 3rd ed. Forthcoming in 2025 (20th anniversary).

Venus in the Dark explores the legacy of Sara Baartman, the “Hottentot Venus,” in representations of Black women's beauty and sexuality in popular culture, from Josephine Baker to dancehall and hip-hop videos, examining theories of reclamation and redefinition in the work of Black women artists while also pointing to distorted representations of contemporary Black women in mainstream media.

Body as Evidence: Mediating Race, Globalizing Gender. Albany: SUNY Press, 2012.

Body as Evidence is an interdisciplinary study analyzing early twenty-first-century popular culture in global perspective and Black women's representations within it: including discussions of digital culture and global feminisms.

Courses Developed

WSS 242X (now WSS 342X): "E-Journal Editing and Publishing" (co-developed with Vivien Ng and Vivien E. Zazzau through the Innovations in Teaching Grant for the peer-reviewed undergraduate editing of the electronic journal, transcending silence...)

In this course, we will edit and publish an e-journal. Additionally, we will study the impact of information technology on our daily lives. In the first part of the course, we broaden our understanding of IT and its effects by examining the impact of the internet and digital media on how we read, write, and access information. In part two, we study the impact on writing. In part three, the final unit, we edit and publish transcending silence ... <www.albany.edu/ws/journal>

WSS 282Z: "Narratives and Counter-Narratives" (to serve as a general education writing intensive course and an introductory course to the concentration in "Writing, Arts, and Activism" for the undergraduate major in Women's Studies)

This interdisciplinary course examines feminist and other subversive responses to "master narratives" that silence or prompt alternative narratives addressing concerns from marginal perspectives. We will explore different narrative genres and determine the effectiveness of producing counter-hegemonic expressions to challenge viewpoints from the mainstream or status quo and to advance social justice for women and other under-represented groups. Students will also create their own counter-narratives as a final project while assessing these issues.

WSS 292: “Feminism in Action” (to serve as a supervisory course taught by Undergraduate Director)

The aim of this course is to introduce students to feminist activism and local advocacy and community organizing before they take the upper-level course “Internship in Women’s, Gender, and Sexuality Studies” (WSS 492). This course will immerse students in conversations about and models for feminist action, practices, and engagements with diverse communities addressing social inequalities and social justice issues concerning the intersections of gender, race, class, sexuality, and other factors. Students will have opportunities to connect classroom learning with outside players and communities engaging feminist practice.

WSS 361: “Gender and Nation in World Cinema” (co-developed with Vivien Ng)

The aim of this course is to apply critical race, postcolonial, and feminist theories in the examination of intersections of gender and nation in cinematic representations from different world regions. We will explore national cinemas through historical, transnational, cultural and political contexts and engage these issues through critical thinking and writing exercises. In a given semester, the course may focus – through the cross-cultural lens – on one geographical region, cultural tradition, or theme.

WSS 533: “Race, Rape Culture, and the Law” (co-developed with Donna Young) and re-titled “Race, Rape Culture, and Advocacy” (Fall 2021)

The seminar will examine the extent to which law and social attitudes contribute to normalizing and/or trivializing sexual harassment and assault against women. The changing social landscape in which rape law in the United States has been defined and enforced exposes both hostility towards women’s dignity and physical integrity, and fear and misunderstanding of black sexuality. The course is designed to familiarize students with the fundamentals of sexual harassment and sexual assault law and the ways in which race, gender, and identity are implicated in the legal treatment of these issues. Utilizing case studies and historical examples through the lens of intersectional analyses, this course will address the difficult questions of how to move toward an anti-racist and anti-rape society while also examining the social and cultural causes that act as barriers to this progression. This seminar is interdisciplinary and will approach the subject matter through slave narratives, novels, autobiographies, film, music, law review articles, legislation, and case law.

WSS 545: “Black Diasporas, Feminisms, and Sexual Politics”

This course will explore in global perspective concepts of blackness and its relationship to feminist and other women-led and gender-based political movements that have shaped complex discourses on the intersections of race, gender, sexuality, and nationality. Challenging such terms as the “African Diaspora” – a reference to the dispersed locations of African-descended people across the globe – or even the “Black Atlantic,” as coined by Paul Gilroy, we will expand the geopolitical spheres of Europe, America, Africa, and the Caribbean to traverse different oceanic spaces that include “Black Australia” and Afro-Asia. Through these transnational lenses, we will question how blackness, and black femininity in particular, shift meanings in varied locations but also converge in formations of global identities, marginalized experiences, and political movements. Topics covered may include history-telling and memory-making, cultural representations of the “black” body in arts and popular culture, sex trafficking and migrations, articulations of “black feminisms” and sexual identities, and social crises and social change.

WSS 581: “Digital Cultures, Global Circuits, and Feminist Futures”

Digital culture - immersed in the emerging technologies of digital media - has expanded the visibility and interactivity of feminist movements across the globe through interconnected communications, subsequently transforming the meaning and impact of feminist politics. What do such transformations mean for the future of feminist activism and progressive politics both on and offline? What, especially, do these transformations mean for organizing and advocacy across racial, ethnic, trans/national, dis/ability, gender, and sexuality differences? This course will explore the possibilities and limitations of digital technologies in forging transnational and intersectional feminist conversations, community-building, and global solidarity. Topics may include social media and interactivity; hashtag activism and feminist blogospheres; digital migrations and virtual border-crossings; digitized sex and sexualities; sexual violence, trafficking and pornography; cultural appropriations and racial performance; material versus virtual bodies; discursive populisms and backlash; popular culture and digital humanities.
